On a certain February afternoon, before the century had reached middle age, a red-coated, mud-splashed horseman was riding leisurely towards Whalley from the north. Sport had been good, and he felt as happy as a man can feel who has ridden boldly and been well carried in the best run of the season--that is to say, very happy indeed. At Pendleton Bar he paused to pay the toll; then, tucking his hunting-crop under his arm, he produced a cigar-case, lighted a cigar, and resumed his journey. u Hi! hi! hi! shouted a shrill voice behind him. The gentleman, turning round, saw a lad in clogs and a corduroy suit running with all his might. Sir, sir, yove lost yer whip, yove lost yer whip, he cried, holding up the implement in question. Thank you, my lad, said the other kindly. I dropped it while I was lighting my cigar. It was very good of you to run after me. Here is something for you. And with that the rider put his gloved hand into his breeches pocket, took out the first coin he fingered, threw it to the boy, and went on. Hi! hi! hi! hi! What is the matter now asked the horseman, pulling up a second time. See what yove gan me! said the lad breathlessly. Isnt it enough Enough! Its gowd, mon. Its a sovereign, exhibiting it. The...
