Excerpt: . . . at our station, where Francis, big and burly, in well polished russet boots with the reflecting capacity of mahogany, met me with the dog-cart. She arrived yesterday, and has shaken down like a brick. Both the boys are in love with her, and shes bent on making herself pleasant. He bluntly told me what he knew I wished to hear. anes very fond of her, too. She has any amount of intuition, has ane. Francis was developing a tiresome faculty of seeing things through his wifes eyes. If this saves him the trouble of thinking, it also makes him appear a little ridiculous, but we must pay for luxuries. anes virtue leans to the side of shrewdness, and the outlook at the Chase has become prosaic in consequence. Francis flicked the mare with his whip, and we spun away down the familiar steep road. The sun was shining above the twisted granite peaks in the south-west--once the limit of my world---the soft wind, which crossed the moors, brought down with it from the rugged uplands the peach-like fragrance of the gorse. Margaret and I had watched the shadows stealing across the mountains encircling the lovely Italian lake; from the deck of the Foam Flower we had counted the headlands of the sun-steeped coasts of Spain and Italy; we had tossed together in a Biscay gale when the big waves snapped at the tumbled sky, and the spindrift danced behind was the sympathy of these common...
