Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: . become practical farm -rs, and also to prepare them sufficiently to be able to take up advanced studies for practical purposes, should they desire to do so. The Jewish agricultural school must train farm helpers, who may, after several years of work for others, become independent farmers. The task of such school, therefore, is to train the young men for the rank and file, and not for leadership. No Jewish community can afford to equip and maintain a school which will equal even the poorest equipped state Institution, and in such we cannot train leaders. With less sacrifice, if leaders are needed, individual communities can educate them in the higher agricultural educational institutions, like Cornell University in the East, and the Michigan Agricultural College In the West It might be suggested that the orphan asylums should Introduce agriculture for their wards, not with any practical purpose In view, but as a form of manual training the object of which should be to arouse In the children an Interest in nature, and to develop through nature studies their higher intellect; to teach them some facts, the knowledge of which may make them useful on the farm; to make them familiar with domestic animals by bringing them in contact with farm animals in the stables; to teach them the principal parts of plants and their uses for men. By Introducing school gardens we may arouse Interest in farming in some of the wards and prepare them for...
